Bought this game for my sister in law. She loves stand up comedy and after seeing a multitude of her favorites had contributed to the game I decided to give it a go. We played over the holidays, there were six of us including our parents. Lots of laughs, though some of the cards were quite lengthy to read and could lead to a more distracted game play. Very similar to cards against humanity as far as the mechanics. Overall a fun game to play if you are with a group of people who can appreciate crude and awkward humor. Even our parents who are not familiar with most of the comedians had a few big laughs.

Hilarious! You can only play it with certain types of people though because some of the answer cards are really lengthy. Every time I play this game someone whines about how much they have to read. Doesn't bother me...I think it's a fun game!

Playing this is like attending a game night hosted by your favorite comedians. This parlor game inspired by the likes of Apples to Apples makes hilarious use of material written by Zach Galifianakis, Sarah Silverman, Judd Apatow, Mindy Kaling, Fred Armisen, and more. The Believer Box of Bad Advice contains 200 cards 100 "Questions" and 100 "Answers. The rules are simple: The dealer distributes five "Answer" cards to each player and then draws one "Question" to read aloud. The players then choose the "Answer" from their hand that they feel is the funniest response to the dealer's question. The dealer judges the answers to his question and decides which player wins, usually based on whichever card elicits the most laughs. Random hilarity is guaranteed!
